Bushcraft

Growing up here, the bush was a place of learning. Hunting skills and foraging for bushfoods, the aroma of campfire smoke, plants, fresh damper and foods that were cooked on the coals evokes powerful memories. My family continues these practices just as our ancestors before us have done for thousands of years.

Cultural knowledge

The bush and waterways are part of the life experience of our people. Cultural knowledge is passed down from family and ancestors who teach us to be familiar with the land and waterways, and how to benefit from it. Our Dreaming stories and language connect us to the land. We also call the rivers and creeks the same name as our umbilical cord because they both sustain life. So when we look after the land and waterways it will look after us.

Traditional life on Country

Traditionally our people lived with extended family in bush shelters called kaalak. We didn't have a fixed place that we called home. Our real home was the vastness of the territory that we lived in and moved around on, following the seasonal food sources. It was and still is referred to as our 'kaaleepga' or homeland. Wherever we made our fire and shelter on Bindjareb Boodja, we were in our territory and part of the Noongar Nation.
